In submitting their Report under this provision of the Charter, the Trustees deem it their duty in view of the general desire which exists to obtain full information in regard to the Institution committed to their management, and the objects which are contemplated in its foundation, to enter into much greater detail than would be necessary if its establishment were not so recent, and its origin so unusual. Peter Cooper, a mechanic and merchant of the City of New York, having become satisfied early in life that the working classes of this city required greater opportunities for instruction and rational recreation than were afforded by existing institutions, determined, if he could command the means, to found an institution designed especially to supply the needs, of which he himself had been conscious.
