Excerpt: .the fading wake That the boat left on the bosom Of the ever dark ning lake. And listened to mournful dirges That the hemlock whispered low. Then I spoke thus to my darling, As we wandered homeward slow: The love that burns in his bosom For his long lost dusky mate, Is the same I bear you, Irene; Say, dear, do I speak too late? My eyes met those of my darling, And those eyes were dimmed by tears, But the answer that I read there Will bless all my coming years. By C. C. Lord O she was fair! but yet to eyes Of sight unskilled she faded soon. Yet he who saw what never dies Beheld her still his royal boon. When others sighed and mourned her fate, He smiled and, in triumphant strains, Sang, Lo! the rose of blest estate . Still lives and twice her bloom regains. With slight regard they heard his lay. Not knowing whence such ardor flows, And, grieved, his soul went up the way To her--the dead yet living rose. By Fred Myron Colby I have before me a Register of New Hampshire for 1829, lacking its covers, title page and a goodly portion of leaves at each end of it, and so thoroughly tattered and covered with smoke and dust as to make it a fit emblem of the good old times it relates to. Like the generation of office-holders, to whose names and services...
